

Art

Industrial art: Graham Hudson comes to King's Cross

Jared Schiller, Source: Guardian

Tuesday 6 April 2010 23.00 BST

Shares 0

Save for later

0:09 / 3:52

Embed

Towering rubble and rusty relics - but which is the art? Graham Hudson, sculptor in residence at the building site north of King's Cross station in London, shows us around the space that will be his studio for the next six months

Topics Art Street art Installation Sculpture London holidays

Popular videos

Bedford prison rioters shouting in jail gangways- video

Ted Nugent grabs his crotch at Donald Trump rally

Naomi Klein at the Great Barrier Reef: what have we left for...

José Mourinho questions his Manchester United...

Jürgen Klopp says Liverpool can still improve after hitting...

Ireland full of respect for the All Blacks after historic...

Jared Schiller

Jared Schiller is a freelance video producer and director specialising in contemporary art

May 2015

Ready to land on a multicoloured moon? Adrian Searle takes on the Venice Biennale - video

Guardian art critic Adrian Searle enjoys the excess of the Venice art show - then ends up feeling like a baby

11 May 2015

April 2014

Richard Wilson's Slipstream: we put a stunt plane into a computer and spun it - video

The artist talks us through his new sculpture - 78m long, 77 tonnes in weight and filling Heathrow's new Terminal 2. 'This being an airport,' says Wilson, 'I started thinking about journeying and flight. The structure is itself a journey from A to B. It's about travelling in space.'

23 Apr 2014

